

Tuesday 22 June 2010

WHISKY INDUSTRY BACKS PLANS FOR ALCOHOL DUTY REVIEW

The Scotch Whisky Association welcomed the Chancellor's decision to freeze the excise duty on alcohol and to press ahead with a review of the system this autumn.

The current alcohol duty regime discriminates against Scotch Whisky, a major UK manufacturer and exporter. Scotch Whisky already carries 37% more duty than the same amount of alcohol served as beer, 19% more duty than wine and 224% more duty than cider, the Association said. The VAT rise in January 2011 will increase the discrimination faced.

The Scotch Whisky industry also welcomed the announcement that corporation tax would be cut over the next four years.

Gavin Hewitt, Chief Executive of the Scotch Whisky Association said:

“The Chancellor has made a sensible and welcome decision to freeze excise duty. He is also right to press on with an early review of the current excise duty system.

“We encourage the Government to look closely at taxing all drinks at the same rate according to alcohol content, coupled with a ban on below tax sales. We believe this route would help the Government address its concern over the pricing of alcohol, would secure greater social responsibility and would offer increased revenue.

“Today's announcement on corporation tax will also help Scotch Whisky play its part in growing the UK's manufacturing and export sector.”

- ENDS -

For further information:

Campbell Evans, Director of Government & Consumer Affairs T: 020 7629 4384

M: 07768 002262

David Williamson, Public Affairs Manager T: 0131 222 2930

M: 07730 496151